

Holding Companies Accountable

Lessons from transnational human rights litigation

Brot
für die Welt

MISEREOR
• IHR HILFSWERK

Table of Contents

I. Transnational human rights complaints – a chance for justice?	4
II. Current international debate	5
1. Human rights complaints against companies	6
2. Complaints in the home countries of transnational companies	6
3. Complaints in the host countries	6
4. Lack of effective legal protection for victims of corporate injustice	7
III. Typical case scenarios: denial of victims' rights	7
1. Land grabbing and the extraction of raw materials	7
a) Expropriation of property by a government without adequate compensation	8
b) Land grabbing through agreements between companies and local populations	10
2. Environmental and health damage caused by extractive and agro-based industries	10
3. Irresponsibility along the global supply chains	11
4. Criminalisation and persecution of protest movements	14
IV. Obstacles to court enforcement	15
1. Practical and political obstacles	15
a) Weak civil society and governance structures	15
b) Precarious security situation of the affected person and their organisations	16
c) Limited resources	16
2. Legal obstacles in Germany	16
a) Lack of preventive, transnational remedies	16
b) Lack of clear arrangements concerning the liability of subsidiaries and supplier companies	16
c) Unclear due diligence obligations of parent companies regarding subsidiaries and supplier companies	18
d) Insufficiently protected legal interests under civil law	21
e) No complaint mechanism for large victims' groups and high financial risk	21
f) No criminal law for corporations	21
V. Law Reforms: Political recommendations	22
1. Legal provisions on the extent and content of corporate due diligence obligations for subsidiary and supplier companies	22
2. Compatibility with the Rome II Regulation	22
3. Extended catalogue of legal interests for compensation laws	22
4. Easing the burden of proof	22
5. Introduction of group actions	22
6. Corporate criminal law	23